

When I think of Janice and Larry Ludden , the words selflessness, giving and humbleness come to my mind. I actually give credit to Janice's parents for being a strong influence on her life and an example to Larry. You see her parents were missionaries in other countries as well as here in the United States. Her dad is a minister and still preaches from time to time at local churches.

A few years after I met Janice her brother tragically lost his wife to cancer and was left with three small boys. Janice did not even blink an eye and quickly became an important part in raising them. They lived in North Carolina. She drove down to North Carolina every 2 to 3 weeks to help her brother during a time of grief to raise the kids and keep the family going. The support and time that Janice and Larry gave was unimaginable. The boys are grown now and one is in college. Janice and Larry are still active in their lives.

When Janice is home she also spends a lot of time being a support system to so many of her neighbors and church members. She is a great listener to people who are going through storms in their lives. She also has brought countless meals to people of which I myself have been a recipient several times. She helped a neighbor whose house was damaged in a fire. She travels to nursing homes and visits with people. Janice and Larry are very much hands on.

Together Janice and Larry both physically and emotionally support people. They pray for people and their situations. They are prayer warriors. There is a very old book entitled "The Emancipation of Robert Sadler". His life was a testimony for the Lord. They are the Robert Sadler's in my life.
